Subject: RE: A question for structure

Hello Tom,

The header in the schedule (8'-7" to 10'-6" maximum rough opening) is designed for the future expansion (two stories) which includes the weight of the second floor as well as the roof on the header above the bay window. The header required for the two story application is a 5 1/4" x 11 7/8" LVL as stated in the schedule with 3-2x6 jack studs. However, with the single story condition with roof load only on the header (plus the additional dead weight of the second floor joists that are installed) and the rough opening only 9'-0" (please verify) the header is more lightly loaded and only requires a single 2x6 jack stud (marginal).

I assume the appropriate 5 1/4" x 11 7/8" LVL header was installed above the opening. Hence, when the future expansion is implemented (i.e. two stories), the single jack stud will be inadequate to support the intended load. To remedy this issue during the proposed future expansion, an additional header will have to be installed in the second floor wall directly above the first floor header to remove the weight of the roof from the first floor header and the jack studs for the second floor header will have to align with the king studs at both ends of the header on the first floor. This does not mean that a window will have to be installed, only that the second floor wall shall be framed in this manner.

There are concealed flange beam hangers that could have been installed prior to the header installation. Yet that is not a good solution now as it would require the removal of the header to install. In addition, there are "header hangers" that could be installed now without removing the header yet they do not have nearly the capacity required.

Please advise as to what you would like me to do.

Best,
Joe

Subject: A question for structure

Hi Joe,

Yesterday we had a framing inspection and he noted some differences in the plans and the actual. The only one that is really significant, (not an easy fix) is the header and structure around the 3 bay window in the salon. The header schedule calls for 3 kings and 3 jacks and they only did one jack. The inspector noted that it might be possible for the architect to come up with some type of hanger that would eliminate the need to tear it apart and redo it.

My thoughts are more, can we justify that it meets code as is and submit an amendment to our plans. I just looked for something in the code that defines the header requirements and was not able to find anything.

What are your thoughts?
